Reality Check: Sometimes One Dose Isn't Enough Ericka K. F. Simpson
Suzanne Tucker feels like all the odds are against her. She is unable to bear children, her marriage is falling apart and she is unsatisfied with the current position she holds at her job. Suzanne feels like God has failed her so she decides to take matters into her own hands in order to have the good life she feels she deserves. Her main mission is her career. As a print journalist, all Suzanne has to do is showcase her talents for others to see and what better stage to present it on than the internet. She starts an anonymous blog to report the real news about prominent people in the county but is it really 'real news' she's blogging about or is she using her internet stage to quench the desires of her own personal vengefulness against others? Meanwhile, the tragic death of Tasha Everett, a high school valedictorian and community favorite, has the homicide detectives in a whirlwind. With the primary elections looming, the Mayor wants the responsible party for Tasha's death brought to justice. However, circumstantial evidence and no leads has the detectives at a standstill. Will the lack of a motive cause someone to get away with murdering the county's most heartfelt success story?
