Pseudepigrapha: An Account of Certain Apocryphal Sacred Writings of the Jews and Early Christians (Classic Reprint) William John Deane
It treats of some curious Pseudepigraphal Jewish and Christian writings composed in the times immediately preceding or following the commence ment of the Christian era, and aims at giving a succinct account of these productions for readers who are not familiar with the originals. The books comprised in our English Bibles under the name of Apocrypha are excluded, as they have been sufficiently examined of late years, and commentaries upon them are readily available. Some of the works treated in this volume are comparatively unknown to English readers, but those (like the Book of Enoch) which have obtained more currency among us could not be omitted from our survey, especially as they form an integral part of the literature of the period, and are often referred to and cited.
(Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and don't occur in the book.)
