Song of Songs of Solomon is a beautiful book. I am swept away by the astonishing use of color, of close-up photography, of the lyrical movement from page to page, image to image, passage to passage of text. There is a synthesis here that is beautiful and moving. The narrative itself is heightened by the intensity of longing the images convey: again, this arising out of the intensities of color and composition and perspective. The narrative seems to operate simultaneously as a spiritual and physical pilgrimage. The soul moving between the King's castle and the Mother's house, seeking love, union, transcendence of the binaries, King and Mother. The lover making the same crossing, from castle to house, toward, with, seeking the beloved. Soul and lover, each its own veneration, celebration, each capable only of a partial realization of love/redemption/delight. A process of toward. In the journey across or between, fraught with terror, fulfillment becomes possible. The journey of the spirit into awareness, the journey of the lover toward the beloved. Each prong of the journeying essential to the other, each affording the other. The embrace of the self and the lover are one. The losses, confusions, separations, isolations stages in knowing, becoming, loving, self and other. Marthe Reed
